

Samsung Galaxy Z Fold 6, the latest release in Samsung's Samsung Galaxy Fold Series, offers a sleek, durable design with a larger screen size that unfolds to provide a tablet-like experience. In this newest iteration, the model boasts a better immersive experience with increased performance metrics, powerful cameras, and an improved hinge. With these improvements, users demanding both versatility and performance may find this phone attractive. This advertisement demonstrates the capabilities – performance, and display - of this model and how its features will benefit users, specifically gamers. This evaluation covers creativity and originality of visuals, quality of message, appeal to target audience, visual and originality of elements, emotional impact, brand impact, and call to action.

In terms of creativity and originality of visuals, I find it somewhat lackluster. While Samsung's gaming-focused advertisements typically feature dynamic and engaging visuals, this particular ad starts with a predictable scene of two people playing a game. Unlike its predecessors, which have creatively depicted characters coming to life to showcase immersion, this advertisement relies on a simple blurring background and close-ups of the actress's and actor's expressions. Although effective in conveying immersion, it lacks the punch and imaginative flair that can truly captivate me and the audience. Additionally, many brands begin their advertisements on performance similarly, a person or more playing a game and zooming into the phone's screen. Although this directing approach immediately fills me in, it can also be harmful; straightaway, I knew what the advertisement was all about, which ruined my intrigue over the advertisement, making it difficult for me to skip the advertisement. I would suggest the advertisement begin with an action scene – two characters brawling, magical visual effects, or characters coming to life – to clinch my interest before panning out or zooming in on a person playing a game. This creates a sense of awe and hooks me before I even realise it, reeling me in to continue watching.

The advertisement conveys its message clearly and boldly – this model is a high-performance phone that opens like a book. The advertisement cuts to the chase, albeit predictable, and shows the viewers exactly what it's capable of. The advertisement included its rival, Apple, as a benchmark to illustrate the superior performance of its device. The opening scene, with the actress's urgency and desperation to win the final round of her game, reminded me of my own experiences. I could feel the annoyance in her voice as her friend exclaimed that he was lagging. Observing the iPhone struggle while the Galaxy Fold 6 excelled – offering consistent, smooth gameplay with incredible graphics - further solidifies my confidence in Samsung, albeit it may partly be influenced by my preference against iPhones.

The advertisement is crafted to appeal to both casual and competitive gamers who prioritize performance, speed, and graphics quality in their devices to fuel their on-the-go gaming needs. The advertisement does not rely on bright colours or high-intensity music to captivate viewers; instead, it is set in a rather unassuming place. This subtle approach is implicitly relatable, resonating with viewers. However, this approach might miss capturing the attention of gamers who are drawn to more visually dramatic and high-energy advertisements. As someone who values the convenience of mobile games for playing on the go and killing time between classes, I find that this directing choice resonates with me. This advertisement reflects on the reality of mobile gaming – it can happen anytime, anywhere - which keeps it grounded and relatable. I appreciate the directing style because it effectively illustrates the “show, don’t tell” technique. Additionally, the advertisement highlights its ability to unfold into a larger screen explicitly, which attracts me, who wants a powerful device that technically has a large screen that can fit in my pocket. At the 0:12 mark, when the actress unfolds the phone and seamlessly transitions to a larger screen without any compromise on the performance, it left me impressed, delivering a compelling case for why gamers like me should choose Samsung over Apple.

The advertisement showcases a fictional game that bears a resemblance to titles developed by a company renowned for creating anime-style gacha games requiring high-performance specifications. I am not a fan of Mihoyo’s games as I find the gacha system less appealing to my taste; however, I do enjoy games such as Life is Strange or Alien Isolation, which also requires powerful specifications. Regardless, the current mobile game market is dominated by Mihoyo games or its competitors, so it is no surprise that such games are included. However, the emotional impact could be stronger if the ad included a variety of game genres and titles, resonating with a wider audience.

The advertisement included a slogan, shown at the 0:12 mark, “Unfold to see what others can’t,” which resonates with the needs of both competitive and casual gamers like me by suggesting an advantage in gameplay. The slogan was placed on the side of the phone, close enough to be impactful, but far enough not to overshadow the display on the screen. This phrase not only appeals to the target audience but also positions itself as the leader in the mobile gaming industry. By highlighting its performance and its wide-screen display, the ad successfully conveyed the model’s competitive edge in the market; that is, by having a larger screen, gamers have an advantage as they can see more of what’s happening clearly.

Samsung leverages its established reputation in the mobile market to reinforce its credibility, emphasizing innovation and reliability in the model market. The Galaxy Z Fold series has made foldable devices not just a novelty but a viable option for everyday use. Its commitment, drive for innovation, and unrelenting need to push boundaries have solidified its position as one of the giants in the market. The comparison with an iPhone underscores Samsung's confidence in its superiority, reinforcing the brand's credibility and users' trust in the company. One of the 3 values by Samsung, Create the Best Products and Services, is exemplified in this advertisement. The company is not afraid of embarking into uncharted territory or experimenting with new technologies, as demonstrated with the release of the foldable phone series. This also aligns with one of their core values, change. When foldable phones were believed to be the next evolution in mobile technology, Samsung seized the opportunity and manufactured a highly successful lineup of foldable phones.

The call to action in the advertisement, "Powerful immersive gaming," speaks directly to competitive mobile gamers. I am not a competitive mobile gamer, but I enjoy indulging in lag-free high-definition gameplay occasionally. The advertisement then quickly cuts to her folding the phone while having the phrase, "Galaxy AI is here," over it, which I feel is disjointed for an advertisement meant to show how it stomps Apple in the mobile gaming market. A more cohesive call to action would be "Unfold the future of gaming with Galaxy Z fold 6." This call to action highlights the phone's capability to be unfolded. Finally, the advertisement ends with the phone on display, urging viewers to purchase the phone. Nevertheless, sad to say, the advertisement did not engender an urge to replace my current device with a Galaxy Z Fold 6.

The advertisement is relatable, but the sense of awe and urgency it gives is insufficient. In conclusion, the Samsung Galaxy Z Fold 6 advertisement succeeds in conveying its message clearly and effectively, leveraging on Samsung's brand strength and highlighting the device's unique features; however, the ad could benefit from more innovative visuals to captivate me truly. By making this change, the ad would be much more memorable and impactful to me.