KUALA LUMPUR: The cyberattack on Kuala Lumpur International Airport's (KLIA) systems caused a disruption lasting several hours on Sunday (March 23).

A highly placed source said the incident, which began in the early hours, rendered the airport's flight information display system, check-in counters and baggage handling inoperative, forcing airlines and airport staff to switch to manual operations.

It is learned that initial findings suggested a cyber intrusion had compromised KLIA's critical systems, leading to the prolonged outage.

"However, authorities have yet to confirm the nature of the attack or identify the parties responsible."

"The situation was further compounded by the lack of a robust backup system, which slowed recovery efforts."

An aviation industry source said flight information boards were down intermittently for two days following the attack before returning to normal.

"Can't say we weren't affected. Thousands of people saw that the boards weren't working."

MAHB's corporate communications general manager Shukreen Ma, however, denied airport operations were affected.

She said the flight information display screens were recovered within four hours.

"Flight operations and passenger processing continued within that time.

"Airport operations did and continue to run normally."

Yesterday, Prime Minister Datuk Seri Anwar Ibrahim revealed that MAHB was hit by a cyberattack, with hackers demanding a US$10 million ransom.

Anwar said he was informed about the incident which happened over the weekend and didn't hesitate to reject the hackers' demands.
